High Point Farms
2120 High Point Road
Forest Hill, MD 21050

This farm, known for years as simply "The McCreary Farm," formed a part of the farm community, High Point, which thrived during the 1800's. Other buildings which formed the community of High Point included a post office and a school.

The house on High Point Farms has undergone drastic alterations, leaving very little information concerning its architectural heritage. Names of early owners of the property do not appear on either the 1798 Federal or 1814 Maryland Tax Lists, although the log unit and the brick unit may date as far back as those tax assessments.

High Point Manor is located on High Point Road in Forest Hill. The house faces east. The house has been drastically remodeled over the past fifty years and its present owners are continuing that tradition.

The house is eight bays long. This comprises three different units, all blended together with aluminum siding. The first unit consists of the three southern bays; the second, and probably the original, unit is comprised of the next two bays; The last unit consists of the three northern bays. The first unit is frame covered with aluminum siding. It has also had French doors added to its south gable end. These have now been changed to a bay window. The center unit is log covered with brick and later with aluminum siding. The end unit is brick covered with aluminum siding. The new owners have covered the entire west facade of all three units with redwood siding and are planning to cover all other sides with brick in the near future.

The log unit was discovered when workers were enlarging a doorway on the west facade for sliding glass doors. It appears to be the oldest and has the most layers of "improvements". A corbeled brick chimney on the roof of this unit can be seen in the attic and on the second floor but all traces of it have been removed from the first floor. There is no cellar under this unit. A narrow door on the second floor near the chimney appears to have been a passageway at one time. The only entrance to the attic level at this time is through a stairway in the third (brick) unit.

There is a basement under both the north and south additions. A kitchen unit is located on the south end of the west facade. This unit is probably the most recent one of the entire house.
